Every Tree is Somebody in Luckenbach

by Phillip Agnew

The first sight one sees when walking up or driving the Luckenbach Loop are the magnificent Live Oak Trees. Before Luckenbach, before the settlers, music and memories were made and collected, I can see the Comanches watering their ponies in Grape Creek and if I listen, I can hear the Indian drums, the singing and dancing, just as the Luckenbach guests do today, gathered around the Pickers circle.

The live oaks teach us so much. It lives in my imagination that the live oak is pleased to be a live oak. There is something so sure and dignified in a tree's presence. They easily let go of old forms of life to practice new forms of hospitality. Even our trees agree that "Everybody's Somebody in Luckenbach." Their example teaches me that when I let go of old resentments, I am free to practice hospitality. Thank you trees! They understand change by balancing the perennial energies of winter and spring. Another lesson for us two leggeds about balance.

When I was about six, my American Indian grandfather, GreyHawk, asked me if I knew trees. I said yes and he laughed at me and told me to follow him. When he found just the right tree, he told me to sit down and wrap my arms and legs around the tree. I did as I was told because I always obeyed my grandfather. He said he would be gone a little while and for me to stay there and get to know the tree. I did. He was gone about FOUR hours. When he returned, he smilingly asked me if the tree and I had become good friends. I knew what he meant and said yes. On the Rez., lessons start early in life.

I can't go wrap around our big live oaks but sometimes Culprit the Curious Cattle Dog and I walk over at Sun Up and sit under their beauty while everything is quiet and I can listen to them. If I could speak live oak, imagine the stories they could tell about what they witnessed over the years. Oh...the stories would fill books. Music, laughter, tears, love, and most of the time language of the heart.

I am so very grateful that Luckenbach's management family loves these trees and spares no expense taking the very best care of them. Recently, Mr. James Rooni, a recognized expert who owns Austin Oak Wilt Services spent several weeks feeding and doctoring these magnificent beauties. So, when you spend a little on a beverage, a coffee cup, T shirt or bumper sticker, do it knowing you also are contributing to helping maintain the beauty for all to enjoy.
